PRINTERS ROW — Jones College Prep’s controversial principal will remain at the high school after the head of Chicago Public Schools opted not to remove him — despite the local school council’s vote to oust him.

CPS CEO Pedro Martinez issued a statement saying he would not go forward with dismissal proceedings against Joseph Powers, citing “insufficient evidence.”

Several members of Jones’ local school council had been working for months to oust Powers, accusing the principal of ignoring problematic teachers and doing little to disrupt a culture of racial and gender-based discrimination at the school. CPS launched an Title IX investigation into Jones earlier this year after allegations of discriminatory practices involving the school’s athletic teams.

Tensions reached a fever pitch when Powers reversed a previous decision to allow a budding cross country star to train with the boys’ team due to inadequate facilities on the girls’ teams.

The school’s LSC voted 8-2 last month to ask Martinez to approve written charges against Powers and start the process to fire him after 14 years at Jones. The post-midnight vote came after a tense and combative seven-hour virtual meeting.

Martinez had 45 days to approve or reject the school council’s request to take administrative action. Powers could not be reached for comment.

Local school council members Cassie Creswell, Sarah Ma and Leni Mana-Hoppenworth have accused Powers of failing to prevent discrimination against students and teachers, financially mismanaging the school, and not addressing years of complaints of inappropriate behavior against two teachers, including a drama instructor who was suspended in October amid a misconduct investigation.

Long before the Supreme Court decided that a woman’s right to an abortion was a privacy issue, I helped a few friends obtain illegal abortions. They had no choice. I almost had one myself, but chickened out on the steps of the abortionist’s old row house in Newark, New Jersey.

Prior to the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, most women I knew had a secret contact closeted away in the flap of her wallet or scotch-taped to a page in her locked diary. The Supreme Court ended that phase of our lives. No longer would we meet in secret and whisper in corners about where to go for an abortion.

One year I drove a group of friends from New Jersey to a roadside motel outside of Baltimore. There were two girls to a room. It cost two hundred bucks, paid for with babysitting earnings or waitressing tips. Where did I get the abortionist’s name and number? I have no idea. But I do know this: in the 1960s my friends knew I could and would help them.

The Roe v. Wade decision came as a surprise. I had paid attention, written to Washington in support of the decision and sent plenty of letters to the editor. But I never expected Roe to become the law of the land. It seemed preposterous. Born-again Christians had just started flowering in the 1970s. Hell, I was one myself. I even joined a Christian cult. But anti-abortion wasn’t the primary cause at the beginning of the Christian Right movement. They took aim at teaching creationism in the schools and working against ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. To the Moral Majority, the ERA was—and still is—a threat to what they call traditional family values. And I call traditional patriarchal values.

“We certainly can’t have women exercising the same rights as men!”

In the five decades that the right to choose has been law in the United States, a steady, ever-escalating squall has been battering its shutters. I know women and men who have worked tirelessly to keep abortion legal, as if any day now the Supreme Court would unlatch and reverse their 1973 decision. I never really believed it would or could happen.
Spontaneity

It’s been happening steadily and gradually, and ... Beth and I are busy again.

Busy as in going to plays, hearing music, joining friends for dinner—we went to see our son Gus a week ago and stayed overnight in Milwaukee.

We forgot how exhausting being busy can be. Fulfilling, but exhausting. (Play along and imagine that it has nothing to do with being two years older back when we were busy before covid.)

So last week we resolved to commit to nothing for this past weekend. Even if one of us brought up something that sounded kind of good, the other would scold: “We agreed not to schedule anything!”

And we ended up with a very enjoyable and full weekend. On Saturday—the nicest day of the year here in Chicago so far, our friend Colleen drove in from the burbs. We lunched at Roots, a place that opened just down the street from our place right before covid and somehow managed to survive. It was the first time Beth and I sat on the second floor—noteworthy because the place has an honest-to-god retractable roof. And it was retracted. It was glorious.

We spent the lunch catching up and enjoying a stiff breeze and the sunshine. It really is pretty cool up there. During lunch I got a text from our friend Jim. He was headed out to a local park to set up and test out a swell new tent he’d just gotten. But he ran into our friend Shannon, who was in town from the burbs with her toddler.

Toddler isn’t quite right. Sprinter is more like it. I saw him flying around at a distance but didn’t recognize him. He was bigger and faster. We hung out at our little plaza/park next to our building, and then headed to Dearborn Park, a proper park with lots of grass, to put Jim’s new purchase to the test.

Now, you should know that Jim is at least 6’5”. When he went looking for a one-person backpacking tent, that dimension was critical. And he found the perfect solution. An especially loooonnng one-person tent.

The rest of Jim is in there somewhere.

The best thing about the tent? The name. It’s called the Solong. Get it? Solo. Long. Solong! Turns out the tent itself is as clever as the name. It uses trekking poles for supports. Beth and Colleen and I watched as Jim assembled it, occasionally holding things down in a stiff wind.

I would call it’s maiden voyage a success. Hello Solong! Beth and Colleen headed off for a walk and my backpack and I headed to the grocery store. Everyone smiled and laughed. Every outdoor café was full and buzzing with conversation. After what seemed like weeks of grey and cold, we were all liberated.

Some neighborhood friends had tickets to the Sunday 4:00 show at Jazz Showcase; they couldn’t use them. But we could! And did. And we heard a fantastic group: the Tom Harrell Quartet. On the walk in, a sign said that “at the request of the group’s management, we ask that you voluntarily wear masks.” We did, as did most in the crowd.

Turns out that the bandleader, Tom Harrell, has both a heart and respiratory condition. In fact, he never stood up and played. He sat in a chair, bent over with his horn pointing downward. He’s 75, and clearly facing challenges. You might think that all sounds sad, but if you’d heard it, you’d have found it both remarkable and inspiring.

So an empty weekend turned, extemporaneously, into a busy and splendid one. There’s still a ways to go, but it’s fair to say, I think, that Chicago is back. And so are we.
Little Flies Everywhere: Huge Swarms Of Midges Take Over Lakefront During Unseasonably Cold And Wet Spring

The midges, which birds eat, are hatching and mating along the lakefront. The good news? Peak mating season will likely be over by the end of next week.

Joe Ward  May 3, 2022

Swarms of midges have been seen in lakefront communities. CHICAGO — As Chicagoans take to the lakefront and open their windows after a long winter, they're being greeted by an especially noticeable annoyance: swarms of midges. Small flies known as midges have been hatching en masse from the lakefront in recent weeks, causing swarms and blanketing nearby windows and balconies.

The insects are seasonal and are usually seen this time in the spring, when they hatch from bodies of water including Lake Michigan. But this year has been especially productive for midges, said Allen Lawrence, associate curator of entomology at Peggy Notebaert Nature Museum.

“This year seems to be a good year to them,” he said. “We’re not exactly sure why.”

Lakefront neighbors have certainly noticed this year’s population of midges. They’ve taken to social media to ask about the midges or to post in frustration after being coated by the bugs.

“They were so bad over the weekend it was almost biblical,” one person on Reddit posted in response to a Chicago resident’s photo of midges crawling over a window screen. “Huge swarms of them just surging outside my windows.”

Midges, known scientifically as chironomids, are an aquatic insect that live and mate near bodies of water. Their larvae live underwater or in wet mud and hatch every spring. The species is prominent in the Great Lakes area. They are sometimes confused for gnats or mosquitoes.

It is prime midge hatching season, Lawrence said. The male midges hatch first and rise from the water into swarms, Lawrence said. The females hatch later and fly into the swarms to mate before laying larvae in water sources. Midges have a lifespan of about 3 to 11 days. Favorable conditions have led to a more successful hatching season this spring, and the cool climate and abundant food sources could keep the midges alive for longer, Lawrence said.

Factors like cool temperatures plus a lack of disease and predators could be the reason for the extra noticeable swarms this season, he said. “You’ll find them everywhere” during the mating season, Lawrence said. “My window is covered with them even though it’s raining.”

In a remote corner of northern Michigan, the residents of Leelanau County have a secret society that has been living on the peninsula for thousands of years. They are the bear-transforming descendants of tribes who crossed Lake Michigan millennia ago to escape the destruction of their clan.

One evening, a traveler has a chance encounter with a spirit bear and discovers he has a hidden history of his own. In the months that follow, he becomes deeply involved with the Sleeping Bear Clan and—depending on your point of view—a murderer.

Asian American and Pacific Islander Heritage Month: Burnt Sugar by Avni Doshi (Overlook Press 2021).

Asian American and Pacific Islander Heritage Month: Burnt Sugar by Avni Doshi (Overlook Press 2021).

It was 115 degrees in Delhi on Mother’s Day. After the walk from the carpark, the blast of cold air from the A/C was disorienting—almost sickening. Inside, a room full of women dined on elaborate fruit drinks and coconut curries. One mother and daughter were dressed alike. As they spoke in hushed tones, we wondered whether any of their lives were as fraught as that of the artist narrator, Antara, and her mother, Tara—who named her only child after herself in Avni Doshi’s first novel, Burnt Sugar. This is the story of uneven love, resentment, and selective memory. It’s about women’s desire to choose their own lives and the costs levied against them and their families as a result of those choices. It’s about an old auntie, who wanted to become a Jain nun, and shave her head and climb a thousand stairs to fast and pray to her god, but was beaten and locked in her room by a father who thought ill of such nonsense. It’s about a young, blue-eyed blonde from Pennsylvania, a wife and a mother who lost both her husband and her child in a car crash and travelled 10,000 miles to an Ashram in India to become the first paramour of a Baba who would replace her with a succession of other women. It’s about Tara, who no longer wished to spend her days waiting by the door for a husband who loved his cruel mother more than his wife, so ran away, dragging her tiny daughter from homelessness to neglect to to become the Baba’s next lover. It’s about Antara, a daughter abandoned by her father and often tortured by a mother who still hopes to even the score. It’s about the natural course of mother-daughter relationships, where roles are frequently reversed. As Tara sinks into dementia, Antara must give her mother the care she never got: because Tara has no one else, because Antara is a South Asian daughter, because she loves her Ma. Antara’s life coach says “her on grasp on reality is being shredded.” Both mother and daughter say and do things to each other that make a reader wince. Antara tried to “bring up instances of her [mother’s] cruelty, casually over tea,” and record the hurt on her mother’s face. Tara reminds her daughter, after giving birth to her own daughter, that “you always used to make me feel like shit.” This book is either dark humor or stark cruelty. The novel stops—it doesn’t end—as Antara clings to the notion that it is “unfair that Ma can put away the past from her mind while I’m brimming with it all the time.” Step into the chaos; it may feel familiar.

Unlocking Memories and Uncovering Stories

Sponsored by the Oak Park Public Library and the Society of Children’s Book Writers and Illustrators (SCBWI) Oak Park Illinois Network

DATE: Thursday, May 12

TIME: 7 to 8:30 pm central time,

Author, journalist and teacher Beth Finke will lead a discussion on ways writing memoir and first-person narratives could apply—and benefit—the writing you do for children. Presentation is online and free to members and non-members of SCBWI.

Through observation exercises and writing prompts, Beth’s workshop will answer common questions about getting started, the difference between autobiography and memoir, exposing family secrets, using pen names and pseudonyms, finding and working with publishers.

A fun and easy-going workshop to discover ways friends, family, celebrations, milestones, moments and place can be catalysts for unlocking memories and uncovering stories.

That’s the official invitation. Now back to me about how I got this gig. Children’s Book Author and Illustrator Sallie Wolf attended the Memoir-Writing Workshop I presented online for Chicago Public Library last winter and liked it. So much so that she contacted me afterwards to see if I’d do something similar for children’s book writers—this one sponsored by the Oak Park Public Library. “I’m hoping you could base it on the exercise you did in the memoir writing class I took,” she said.

The request was flattering, but a little perplexing. That winter workshop I gave was about writing memoir. Why would people who write children’s books want to know stuff about memoir-writing?

And then it came to me. I’ll ask children’s book author Sharon Kramer to present with me! Sharon Kramer’s book Time for Bubbe was published by Golden Alley Press! Many of you know Sharon from my mentioning her in Saturdays with Seniors blog posts here. She was a writer in the Me, Myself & I memoir-writing class I taught in downtown Chicago before COVID, and her Time for Bubbe book is a perfect example of how unlocking memories can lead to children’s stories. When I was still teaching Sharon’s memoir class and assigned “Write About a Grandparent” as a prompt, she came back with a story written in the voice of her grandson talking about visiting her mother (his great-grand-Bubbe). We all loved the piece and thought that, with a little revision, it’d make a great children’s book.

So Sharon got to work. She revised and rewrote, sent the story to publishers, Golden Alley Press took it on, a Yiddish glossary and Bubbe’s recipe was added, illustrator Michael Sayre gave it his special touch, and voila! Sharon’s masterpiece, Time for Bubbe is now available to order from independent bookstores or on Amazon.

I’ll be interviewing Sharon Kramer about her children’s book journey during the latter part of my presentation next week, she’s smart, thoughtful, witty and we always have a lot of laughs when we’re together. Join us! Link to the SCBWI event page for information on Zooming In at 7 pm central time on Thursday, May 12, 2022.

Beth Finke’s books: “Safe and Sound”, “Long Time No See” and “Writing Out Loud” can be purchased at Sandmeyer’s Book Store.
Century And Consumers Buildings, Beverly’s Pike House Top List Of Most Endangered Historic Places In Illinois

The feds plans to tear down the historic Loop buildings as part of a $52 million demolition. They've sat vacant for 17 years. "It's completely ridiculous," one Landmarks Illinois preservationist said. Melody Mercado 1:00 PM CDT on Apr 20, 2022

THE LOOP — Two historic Chicago skyscrapers slated to be torn down by the feds top a list of the state’s most endangered historic places. The Century and Consumers buildings, 202-220 S. State St. in the Loop, and the Eugene S. Pike House, 1826 W. 91st St. in Beverly, have been named to Landmarks Illinois’ 2022 Most Endangered Historic Places list. The list aims to draw attention to historic sites in danger of being destroyed in hope they can be preserved.

Statewide, this year’s list also includes Elks Lodge No. 64 in Rockford, Gillson Park in Wilmette and the Will County Courthouse in Joliet. The Century and Consumers buildings in the Loop’s Retail Historic District have sat vacant for 17 years. The federal government plans to tear them down as part of a $52 million demolition.

Built in in the early 1910s, the creamy-white terra cotta exterior of the two buildings have been neglected by the federal government who bought the buildings in 2007 for a potential office expansion that never materialized, preservationists said.

The Consumers Building was designed by architect https://blockclubchicago.org/2022/04/20/century-and-consumers-buildings-beverlys-pike-house-top-list-of-most-endangered-historic-places-in-illinois/?utm_source=Pico&utm_campaign=5894c0fc27-

Jan and I went car-free so long ago we never think about that decision anymore, such as when the out-of-shape Fargo man about my age I met poolside at St. Pete Beach last month went on and on in disbelief that anyone could live without a car. His increasing health challenges silently testified to the virtue of a life without cars at its center.

We live downtown, close to every El line, to bus lines, to Metra hubs and Divvy stations, and with taxis, Uber and Lyft rides normally quick and affordable. And when all else fails, there’s Zipcar or a family car available nearby. Transportation without car ownership is a normal way of life for us.

Walking and using the CTA are core aspects of our personal mobility. But, since the pandemic, the El lines have become carriages of lawlessness in the evenings, with folks openly smoking on the train as common practice and all more dangerous kinds of behavior adding a tinge of menace to the experience, one amplified by the news of a soaring number of crimes plaguing the system.

So now, for the first time in our life, we avoid CTA trains after dark. Unfortunately, the once-cheap Uber and Lyft options, now that they’ve destroyed the taxi system with venture-funded fare undercutting, have raised rates dramatically, to a point where they’re usually fifty-to one-hundred-percent higher than the cost of a taxi. But good luck getting a cab using the usually excellent Curb app. It works well from our downtown home, but simply says “not available right now” when you try to return from a location on the South Side or even Navy Pier on a busy night.

So when John Greenfield proposed riding the Red and Blue lines all night and writing about the experience, it was a no-brainer to say yes. What is also a no-brainer is that the city needs to get its mobility infrastructure, especially trains and taxis, working again, and now.

Because we’re not buying a car again. We hope.

Still riding the “L”

Taking the “L” home on a Sunday morning, I watched a woman give $10 to a man who was begging. The man noticed another $10 bill in her wallet and asked whether he could have it. She handed it over.

Having just come from church, I remembered Mother Teresa’s famous statement about seeing Jesus in every human. This “L” rider is a better Christian than I am, I thought. When the man moved away, I complimented her on her kindness. “I don’t need it,” she said. “He was lucky. I don’t usually carry cash.”

Chances are, a lot of us wouldn’t miss $20, but we don’t hand it over so readily. I am skeptical about how it will be spent, so instead I contribute to the Greater Chicago Food Depository and the Chicago Coalition for the Homeless.

It wasn’t just the woman’s nonchalance about being generous that impressed me. It was also that such kindness happened on public transportation.

Anyone who has been riding the “L” lately knows how unpleasant it has become since COVID. Smoking, sleeping across several seats, and blaring loud music are common. It seems that more often than not, someone is asking for money. Young men strut from car to car. I’ve observed people ranting and waving their arms — one did so in my face when he and I were the only passengers in a car. “You’re brave to ride the Red Line,” a woman told me. I don’t feel so brave when young people in a group are being rowdy, as was the case when I took the Red Line home from Steppenwolf Theatre at 10:30 the other night. I often feel uncomfortable and even afraid on the “L” or a bus these days, especially after dark.

Fear is warranted; so far this year violent crime on CTA trains is reportedly up 24 percent from the same period last year. But I don’t want to give in to fear of people who are stereotyped as threatening. To put it another way, public transportation is the only place in my life where I’m in the minority, and to avoid it feels racist.

Not abandoning the “L” is as much of a risk as I can handle right now. The CTA recently announced that it would beef up security, especially on the most-traveled Red and Blue Lines. Regardless of whether there’s improvement, I’ll be riding not only because I need transportation but also because it seems like the right thing to do.

I am not excusing bad behavior and hope I’m not being reckless. Some of these “L” riders might be up to no good. But the homeless and/or mentally ill are likely harmless. The man who accepted $20 from my fellow passenger was gentle and grateful.

If I were consistent, I would stop painting the entire West and South Sides as dangerous and find out which neighborhoods are safe. Despite living here for 32 years and giving tours as a Chicago Greeter for the last 15, I still don’t know most of the city because I rarely venture into vast swaths of it. But I’m not Mother Teresa.

Empty store fronts on South Dearborn remind us of the pain of the Pandemic, especially local businesses. A “Revoked” food license sign is on the door of the former Caribbean Jerk Chicken. Another “For Lease” sign next to the former Grail Café which is also closed. And a lease sign on the former Dearborn Denim.

Fountains beautify cities and make them more livable, peaceful, and inviting. They soften the edges of the steel and concrete, and they help the passersby slow down the hustle and bustle of their busy lives.

The Printers Row Park Advisory Council (PAC) needs your help! Almost a quarter of a century old, the Fountain at Printers Row Park is in serious need of restoration, above and below ground. Help us replace its colored enamel reliefs and polish its bronze highlights, upgrade its lighting, repair its pump and pipes so that this unique civic treasure can, once again, gush forth with its original energy and spirit.

In total, we need to raise $110,000 to complete the restoration by the spring of 2022. We requested and are awaiting approval from the Chicago Park District for $35,000 towards the project. Our 4th Ward Alderperson, Sophia King, has not only agreed to provide $35,000 towards the restoration but has also agreed to match dollar-for-dollar up to $10,000 in donations that we receive!

That leaves Printers Row PAC to fundraise $40,000! Please contribute whatever you can to support the South Loop community in bringing the Fountain at Printers Row Park back to its original glory! Visit the fountain before and after the restoration so that you can appreciate the significance of this project.

Tall Enough
by Gloria Bond Clunie
directed by Chris Anthony
Every spring, the J.E. Wilkins Science Pack at Hawkins Middle School celebrates the year with a trip to Wild Winds Amusement Park on their annual Physics Day. One problem— their normally fearless leader, Asia, is secretly terrified of roller coasters! For her team to win this year's Wild Ride Physics Challenge, she must ride at least one. A powerful group of friends unite and resort to extraordinary measures in hopes of helping Asia overcome her fears and discover if they all have what it takes to win.

A man was robbed at a Red Line station early Wednesday morning — the fourth CTA-related attack in less than a week.
The man, 25, was on the elevator at the station in the 1100 block of South State Street about 12:40 a.m. when four people took his backpack at knife point and punched him in the face, Chicago police said. The suspects fled onto a northbound train and were taken into custody at the Clark and Division stop, police said. The man refused medical treatment.
Three others were injured in CTA attacks over the weekend.

The CTA Boosted Security To Battle Violence, Bad Behavior On Trains And Buses — But Riders Say Nothing Has Changed
The CTA has hired four private security firms to try to double the number of unarmed guards patrolling the system 24/7. But even guards say they're ill-equipped to deal with violent or unruly passengers.

CHICAGO — The CTA has added dozens more security guards to the system in recent months, according to the agency — but riders and even some of the guards question if the strategy is making public transportation safer.
Seventy unarmed guards have been added to the ranks since early March, when city leaders announced they would double unarmed security guards from 150 to 300, CTA officials said this week. The changes came after numerous riders said there’s been an uptick in unruly behavior — including people smoking and urinating — and issues with crime on the CTA during the pandemic.
And last week, Sen. Dick Durbin and Rep. Jesús “Chuy” García wrote to CTA officials, calling for greater investments to fight crime on transit. The letter said the CTA has seen a 17 percent increase in violent crime over the past year.
But some riders said they haven’t noticed more guards — or even if they have, they’re not sure it’s helping commuters and employees feel safer.
Guards stationed at a Blue Line stop last week said the size of their patrol groups has not changed since the city’s announcement, and they feel defenseless.
“We’re unsafe on the trains because we’re just kid guards,” said one guard who asked that their name not be used. “They just gave us a flashlight. What are we gonna do with a flashlight? … We’ve been spit on, attacked, all types of stuff.”
There are 200-220 unarmed guards on the CTA each day, with the goal of training and onboarding the rest “as quickly as possible,” CTA officials said in a statement. Unarmed guards are active seven days a week instead of five, and they are “an added layer of trained eyes/ears out on the system for reporting incidents to police,” officials said. Four people were wounded when two gunmen opened fire on an SUV stopped at a light in the Loop. The blue Dodge Durango was stopped in the 400 block of South Wells Street when the gunmen fired from a sidewalk around 1:35 a.m., according to police. A woman, 26, who was crossing the street was hit in the left leg and was taken in fair condition to Stroger Hospital. Three people in the Durango were dropped off at Stroger: A 38-year-old man shot in the back and listed in critical condition; a 31-year-old woman shot in the back and legs and also listed in critical condition; and a 28-year-old woman shot in the left leg and listed in fair condition. The shooting followed several downtown attacks over the weekend.
